Ethiopia

Ethiopia is in northeast Africa, in an area known as the Horn of Africa. It is landlocked and bordered by Djibouti, Eritrea, Kenya, Somalia, South Sudan and Sudan. Ethiopia is Africa’s second most populous country, after Nigeria.

Ethiopia is a country of natural contrasts, with tropical forests to the south and deserts to the east. It has some of Africa’s highest mountains, but also some of the lowest points above sea level. The Great Rift Valley divides Ethiopia’s central mountain range and the Blue Nile rises in Lake Tana in the northwest of the country. Ethiopia’s main climate is tropical monsoon, with regional variations.

Ethiopia is almost unique in Africa in that, apart from a five year occupation by Italy during the Mussolini years, it has never been colonized. Under Emperor Haile Selassie, Ethiopia was a feudal empire until 1974, when a military junta took power. This regime was marked by coups and brutality until 1991, when it was overthrown by the Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF), which committed itself to multi-party democracy; in 1995 Ethiopia’s first multiparty elections were held.

In 2005, accusations of vote rigging during Ethiopia’s third parliamentary elections led to an outbreak of violence and the controversial imprisonment of opposition leaders. The EPRDF was re-elected for a fourth term in May 2010.

Development in Ethiopia

Ethiopia is one of the poorest countries in the world, but there has been significant progress in reducing poverty. According to the UN, in the past five years Ethiopia has registered the fastest change in human development in the world.

It is on track to meet six of the eight Millennium Development Goals by 2015, and has had consistently high economic growth in recent years, the highest of any non oil producing economy in Africa. In the last four years, the percentage of children enrolled in primary school increased from 68 per cent to 83 per cent, with equal numbers of boys and girls now attending school.

However, challenges remain: average life expectancy is 56 years and much of the rural population is at risk of hunger and food insecurity every year. Ethiopia’s economy is based on agriculture, which is adversely affected by land degradation and frequent drought. In 2011 poor rainfall caused a famine in the Horn of Africa region. Population density and the impact of the global economic downturn are adding further pressure to the livelihoods of vulnerable people in Ethiopia.
Irish Aid’s poverty reduction work in Ethiopia

Ethiopia has been an Irish Aid partner country since 1994. In 2010, Irish Aid’s bilateral support to Ethiopia was €37.17 million.

A priority for Irish Aid’s work with the Government in Ethiopia is to improve agricultural practices to reduce hunger, make farming more profitable for small farmers, and to support agricultural research. Ireland also contributes to the development of improved social services. In 2010 Irish Aid contributed significantly to the Productive Safety Net Programme, which provides some of the most vulnerable people in Ethiopia with regular cash or food in return for vital work on projects such as land improvement.

Ireland supports the Government’s effort to help communities affected by climate change and provides assistance for Ethiopian non-governmental organisations and charities. In 2011 Ireland contributed €10 million to support victims of the Horn of Africa famine. In the northern area of Tigray, where Irish Aid has a regional programme, Ireland has contributed to improving crop productivity and road construction.
